DRAWING STRAWS

Drawing Straws, George Pogue's, debut novel, is a "coming of age" book. Set in rural southwest Missouri in the early 1960s, a ten-year-old boy, Newton Carriker, grows into his teenage years. His story includes the usual boyhood pranks, pastimes, and typical traumas—until a mysterious stranger comes to town.

Newton, is rescued from drowning by an African American drifter—a hobo, who befriends the boy, and then is found brutally murdered. Newton's ongoing search for resolution to that murder is, in large part, a key to his becoming a young man.

The story is a serious social commentary about the insular lives of rural people who gloss over the murder of a transient black man, because he was, "not one of their own." The local law enforcement community failed to investigate why a hobo died violently, even when all the evidence pointed to a homicide.

"A good sense of passage of time and what goes on in a small town. Very well written and flows very nicely. The descriptions, dialogue and pacing all work together."

— BOBETTE MCCARTHY
 AUTHOR AND EDITOR

"This book pulls the reader into the story, captivates him and holds him tightly. It has outstanding character descriptions and imagery."

— MARTHA GREGORY
